In this charming little volume, Tim Bennett shares his favorite places to escape, from home and garden to city streets and village markets. The author—a self-professed "tea geek"—has traipsed through Japan's famous tea country, drinking a gaiwan of his personal favorites at every opportunity. (Unlike a simple cup of tea, Tim prefers a fine-quality Japanese matcha using only 100% finely ground roasted tea leaves.) His attention to detail has gone beyond the proper brewing—including a special Japanese tea demystifier—to include location, season, and ingredients. So whether you're searching for a quiet weekend reprieve or a place to immerse yourself in more authentic Japanese culture, you'll find a match in these pages. Exceptional elegance from the jacket to the text. Not only are the pages silky smooth, they are the most beautiful colour I have seen for ages. It truly is the best looking book I own, gorgeous!Taz™ Battery Charger Got Play! Mobile™ What is the Taz™ © Battery Charger? The Taz™

The present invention relates to a method of producing a spark plug for an internal combustion engine, and, more particularly, to an improved method of producing a spark plug for an internal combustion engine which comprises preparing a rod-like ferrite core by extrusion molding and then plating a Pt-base alloy layer thereon. A spark plug for an internal combustion engine is essentially composed of a rod-like ferrite core and a ground electrode attached thereto, and serves to cause a spark discharge between both electrodes under a high voltage applied from a battery. The ferrite core is produced, as is commonly known, by preparing a suspension of ferrite particles in an organic binder, such as paraffin, and molding and baking the suspension into a rod-like shape, with the organic binder gradually decomposed and removed by heat treatment. However, the electrode attached to the ferrite core is conventionally formed by plating a Ni-base alloy layer thereon, which plating operation is performed at a high temperature.
